R&R as part of State responses to illicit adoption practices

As discoveries of (potential) illicit adoption practices continue to emerge, States grapple with how to appropriately respond and balance competing interests, as outlined in this Editorial.

AII States that have undertaken intercountry adoptions have been marred by illicit practices to varying degrees, regrettably some with what appears to be more systemic occurrences. The adequacy of State responses largely depends on political will and, more importantly, courage.

Rest and Recreation – Minimum political will

Denial is a common trademark when faced with an accusation, especially when it touches upon a State's authority. At this stage, States may rest on the fact that ratification/accession to the 1993 Hague Convention - alone - is a sufficient safeguard for undertaking adoptions. Others are lethargic as cases occurred before 1993 or prior to their ratification of the Convention. Should not States explore the Convention's practical - and arguably timeless - principles? These include, most notably, the principle of subsidiarity, the principle that poverty should never be the main reason for separation, that informed consent must be obtained and that there has been no improper money (including donations use of and contributions in States of origin), amongst others. It is of great concern when it seems that adoption has become a recreation, especially when promoted by the media as the 'latest accessory', particularly by Hollywood stars. More recently, it has become worrying when adoption stories are being used to accumulate 'likes' in social media, and eventually become part of a fundraising scheme. States have an important role to monitor and prevent such activities.

Roles and Responsibilities – Emerging political will Glimpses of emerging political will occur when States are ready to explore roles and responsibilities in illicit adoption practices, such as the Dutch and Belgian-Flemish ongoing investigations, as well as the Swiss study of Sri Lankan practices (see Monthly Review No. 240 of March-April 2020). In addition, broader studies on the practical operation of the 1993 Hague Convention in specific areas, such as the financing of accredited adoption bodies in Denmark¹ or studies exploring the experience of adoptive families in Greece and Ireland (see Monthly Review No. 242 of June 2020) will help build more robust child protection systems and protocols for searches for origins and responding to illicit practices.

Nevertheless, such studies can only go so far, without further political will. Recommendations will remain empty without resources to make them realities. Proven political will is essential for ensuring and effective real responses to illicit practices for the adoption triad, and particularly for the children/adoptees.

Respect, Redress, Restoration and Restitution – Proven political will Proven political will starts with respect for all the persons unduly affected by the illicit practice. An understanding of the loss, heartache, stress and other adverse consequences (see p. 13) involves time, compassion and action. It can start with an apology, as in Australia and Canada, but should continue and be accompanied by concrete efforts for restitution and restoration.

Whilst challenges, such as a statute of limitations, questions about the applicability of the 1993 Hague Convention standards pre-1993, and the extent of responsibilities for past governments' actions are real, surely the greater burden is borne daily by the victims of illegal acts.

Transnational justice requires remedies. National laws, policies and practices must be adapted, to provide reparation and sanctions where necessary. The UNCRC's Optional Protocol on Communications will hopefully bring some redress, given the continuing violation of children's rights, into adulthood. Further, the ISS/IRC is currently centralising different national promising practices and complaint mechanisms to build on its 2016 publication on Responding to Illegal Adoptions. Specifically, the ISS/IRC recommends that States allocate resources for training of professionals to support victims, as is currently undertaken by Barnados in Ireland (see p. 8).

Retrospect is a powerful teacher. It is hoped that the lessons drawn from intercountry adoption can benefit other children, including those that are donor-conceived and born through surrogacy (see p. 14). Leaving a legacy of hope for children where their long-term best interests are fully considered is our responsibility (see Editorial in Monthly Review No. 203 of July 2016). The ISS/IRC looks forward to contributing to the work of the HCCH's Working Group on preventing and addressing illicit practices in intercountry adoptions as well developing other tools to provide some restorative justice for all.
